That's why you need to be on the lookout for vitamin D deficiency in your patients. Researchers have long known that vitamin D deficiency is a major public health problem in the U.S. The problem is so severe that a 2015 national poll found that almost two-thirds of all adults and children have vitamin D levels that are below the recommended levels. Unfortunately, we often take the quality of our vitamin D for granted. This is because we know that people who have a cold have easy access to vitamin D in dairy and egg products, for example. This is true, but it's important to know that the vitamin D you find in these foods is produced in a lab and not naturally in our foods. It's also important to know that most processed foods that are fortified with vitamin D are not absorbed by the body. About 1 in 4 Americans don't get enough sun exposure during the winter months, while the rest of us get plenty of sun exposure. There are many reasons why we don't get enough exposure to the sun, including the belief that sunbathing is unhealthy and that we don't need vitamin D. But the truth is that the sun is a tremendous source of vitamin D for us. Another thing to consider is that the UV index varies widely from region to region. Also, even when the sun is out, it's dark at night, and most people cover themselves up. In areas where the sun is covered in the winter, like Ithaca, New York, the UV index doesn't really exist.
