We used two tomato juices, with and without citric acid, and separated the enhanced cholesterol absorption mechanisms in the Caco-2 cells. The high calcium and low magnesium content of the citric-acid-containing tomato juice increased the calcium content of the cells. We found that cholesterol uptake was enhanced by citric acid independently of the high calcium and low magnesium content of the cell. On the other hand, the calcium and magnesium content of the cells did not affect the mechanism of cholesterol absorption enhanced by citric acid. These data suggested that the effect of citric acid on cholesterol absorption is mediated by cell calcium influx. One of the more mundane but essential tasks of deploying your web application is to ensure that your database resides in the same region as your application. And by region, we mean the part of the world that your application will eventually be seen from. I've previously written about why it's always preferable to deploy your database and web application in the same region. In that case, you can have an advantage of having your database replicated across multiple data centres if the region is unavailable due to relocation or general maintenance. If you run your database out of the same region as your application is running from then you can also use the same web app load balancer you use for your front end and SQL Server Agent jobs. If you already have a deployed application then your only requirement is to ensure that your database and application servers reside in the same region. Now there are certain reasons why you might need to have a database in a different region than your application. You might have regional financial transactions where money flow is subject to a region-specific tax and that tax rate is different for different regions. Or perhaps you have regional data that varies by country or state. Many of the smaller deployment scenarios will fit into this box. But there are also the more interesting regional requirements that will require that you have your application and database in different regions. In this blog, I'll show you how to split your database across multiple regions. But
