No.In a number of applications of a battery pack, it is necessary to attach the battery pack to an external device in a manner that permits electrical communication with the battery pack but which prevents the battery pack from being damaged by external forces applied to the battery pack. Currently, external devices are connected to the battery packs either by wire connections or by using a fastener such as a screw. The wire connections can be labor intensive, time consuming and prone to breakage. Furthermore, the wire connections can require a high level of skill and/or training to achieve a reliable and repeatable connection. In addition, the wire connections can add significant weight and cost to the battery pack. The fastener connection techniques can involve attachment of a screw to at least one of the battery pack and the external device, and subsequently, torqueing the screw to create a connection between the battery pack and the external device. The torqueing can be difficult to complete correctly resulting in the connection being too loose or too tight with resultant failure of the connection. In order to overcome some of the problems associated with the wire connections and the fastener connections, some battery packs have been designed with clip-on battery pack connectors. The battery pack connectors are designed to e24f408de9
