I understand that in case of a hiring decision, one would need a compelling reason to get the job rather than just a critical reason. I do not understand what's the difference between critical and compelling. A: To my understanding, 'compelling' reasons are slightly stronger than 'critical' reasons. A compelling reason can be a reason that's relevant and important enough to get you over the hiring hurdle, but if that's your only reason for getting the job, I don't think it would be a compelling reason. I'm sure I'm not the only one who has come across a situation where a colleague delivers a strong critical evaluation of a colleague's performance but you think there is only a slight chance of them getting the job, and you have a compelling reason to get them the job. The word 'compelling' has two meanings, although you can certainly be persuaded by something which is not compelling (like water, for example). However, the sense in which I would use the word here is: 'Reason / purpose is as good / convincing / important / worthwhile... as other reason is'. 186 Ga. App. 856 (1988) 368 S.E.2d 907 KELLEY v.
