The figure for this concern was somewhere in the hundreds of billions of dollars—enough to make anyone a little queasy. As someone who spends a fair amount of time understanding the intricacies of the numbers behind a lot of things, I always knew that Twitter has revenue, but I didn't realize what a big part of their business the 'non-advertising' part is. I was not disappointed to learn that they probably make quite a bit of money on a quarterly basis, but I was somewhat disturbed by their near-sweat-shop atmosphere that has persisted for as long as they've been around. With sales that, at over $1 billion, are not even one-tenth their size, Twitter should be giving these people a decent wage. But when I pointed out that they do not, many people responded with righteous indignation. My reasoning was wrong. It was true that Dorsey is incredibly rich, but not in the above-mentioned higher-than-God-heads ballpark. Instead, Dorsey is much richer than I (and a majority of the Twitter team, I imagine) was at any point in our lives. The reason this is so frustrating is not that a tiny number of people are making huge amounts of money, it's that large numbers of Twitter employees are working at or near poverty wages. According to Tech Insider, who did a great job doing a deep dive into Twitter

What's new:

to Rachmaninoff Monday, February 21, 2018 The Moscow Conservatoire was the nerve centre of the Russian musical mafia. Its musicians had to play by their boss's rules. Sooner or later, they would all find out the hard way. By Clifford L. Laurie For a man who claimed to have studied in the USA with Stokowski and Claude Thornhill, Rimsky-Korsakov was against foreign musicians. Although he took the composer's Bach in his demanding Boston Conservatory course, his music teacher couldn't resist the master's glorious output. He was an innovation, a consummate craftsman. While the model for his compositions was the Russian folk song, he took his cues from the recent Italian operatic style, with elements of Wagner, yes, but with much Slavonic and oriental flavour. So, because of Rimsky-Korsakov, in the Moscow Conservatoire we had the phenomenal cello virtuoso Gumpold Glaserius, imported from Estonia to be the teacher of the future. The bow sense and fluency that he learned in Rimsky-Korsakov's workshop would create an icon of the cello for generations to come. Little Rimsky-Korsakov knew that Glaserius would return to his native lands, his cello bequeathed to a museum there. Then came Rimsky-Korsakov's own students. They too were composers and, like him, respected musicians. But on the rare occasions when he allowed them to be heard they were very uneven. Their music was characterized by a shrill neo-classicism that would later be the albatross of counterpoint. Balabanov and Fomin first went to the conservatoire under the influential baton of Glaserius. He was bored and discouraged by their playing and, he confided in me once, volunteered to help them through the written fraction. Alexandroff was a young, talented student. He had recently come from an excellent conservatoire in Warsaw. He was already a maestro of Russian folk music and could play in a way that was captivating. So Rimsky-Korsakov took him on. He had no need to cultivate an interest in his art. In the West, Alexandroff would be known as Yevgeny Solovyov. He was a composer
