What's new:

Tales from the Endless Loop is a 2001 surreal fantasy film written and directed by David Cronenberg, based on a graphic novel of the same name by Doug Dorst and George Pratt. The film stars Stephen Dorff, Julianne Moore, Juliette Binoche, and Andréa Ferréol. The film presents a series of bizarre and sometimes disturbing sequences based loosely around the themes of gender confusion, anomie, and existential despair. Plot A group of teenage girls in a run-down deluxe motel in northern British Columbia, Canada, are being held captive by a mysterious force. Three girls are being held in a basement, separated by sex. One of the girls runs away during a study session about the nature of love, while the other two girls observe the fight from the porch outside. They return to the storage room and discuss the nature of sexual perversions. The two girls decide that a man is the cause of all their troubles, and dress up like various men as they play a game of "Find the Man" on the phone. They make a bet with one of the kidnapped girls involving the fate of a man known to the latter. One of them finally gets him on the phone, and the man sues them for kidnapping him on the grounds of his gender. The girls state that they are now men, yet are still girls, and they get flustered and cannot understand why the man refuses to sign the papers they have drawn up to be officially recognized as men. In a fit of frustration they decide to end the existence of men and turn all of humanity female through blood transfusion. Meanwhile, in the basement, the third girl slips into the bathroom to rape a male masseur who is shaving another captive. She is surprised by her co-captive and shouts "Don't touch me. I'm not crazy. This is my brother. They're going to turn us all into girls." The girls flee into the arms of the men outside and the latter chase them towards the entrance at the back of the motel, and the first girl dies. The male attendant re-opens the motel entrance and the other girls follow him in the direction of the bar where he takes them. The movie ends with the attendant closing the motel's entrance doors and then leaving after parking the car. The stately "Sunrise Motel" finally looks like it is closing down, although the logo still reads "Sunrise Motel."
