To activate Microsoft Office 2007 Toolkit,. Microsoft Office 2007 is activated by Microsoft Office 2007 Toolkit.Q: Regarding the output of the Wiener filter I am working on a Wiener filter implementation (I am really weak in MATLAB). My question is regarding the output of Wiener filter. I have read some sources (including this) and they mentioned that the Wiener filter output is the best linear approximation of the actual signal. Now, my question is regarding how to exactly get the best linear approximation of the actual signal? and should we just use  $y = A*x+B*y$  then how can we get A and B (in general they both are not known). A: The mathematical foundation of the Wiener Filter is the least mean square error (LMS) method of linear estimation, as explained in this article. This method requires: Knowledge of the noise spectrum The size of the noise variance The variance of the measured signal The bias and drift of the measured signal The first two points are determined by the Wiener Filter If you use the Wiener Filter to estimate a signal and compare it with the original signal to compute the mean squared error (MSE), this is the algorithm you'd run: The mathematical foundation of the Wiener Filter, as explained in this blog. The mathematical foundation of the Wiener Filter, as explained in this article. The mathematical foundation of the Wiener Filter, as explained in the second half of this article. The noise variance and the size of the measured signal are already known and don't have to be estimated. The bias of the signal is a number you would like to estimate, but you're only given the measurement and its uncertainties. The reason the bias term is computed is that it allows the Wiener Filter to have non-zero weights at the beginning and the end of the observed signal. The drift of the measured signal is another bias term that one would like to estimate. So, the filter is designed to minimize the MSE (see above) and to satisfy the following constraints: The bias term doesn't change the measured signal The variances of the noise and measured signal are the same These terms are also known and not estimated, but must be enforced by the algorithm. Finally, the Wiener Filter is designed to be a minimum-complexity estimator and
