Donald Trump Is Not Black Republicans like to pretend that Donald Trump is a black Republican. They are wrong. Trump is what he is; in many ways, he is a very typical white Republican. Trump reportedly never met Barack Obama. The utterance of those words is a lie! Trump has never visited our nation's largest inner-city public housing development and has no desire to do so. It is a disgrace that the estate of Barack Obama would invoke the terrible tragedy at Emanuel AME Church to attempt to justify the President's associations with Mr. Trump. From all accounts, Trump and Obama don't like each other. The feeling is mutual. Obama has never had a civil relationship with the African American community. In fact, his entire presidency can be defined by the relationship to African Americans. He is clearly the first President in my lifetime to have turned a full circle in attitude or action, having had a significant relationship with the African American community and now having turned his back on the African American community. Trump's relationship with the African American community is almost opposite. Trump is the builder who works with the community. Trump is the businessman who builds. Trump is the developer who builds; and in his relationship with the Jewish community, he has shown that he has not forgotten that business. According to a New York Times profile, Trump is about as close to being African-American as you get in the Republican Party: "He doesn't have much use for political correctness, and he practices what he preaches. He talks more than he listens, and he's not shy about being forthright — and sometimes crude. To be precise, though, he's not black." During a media tour of a Trump building in New York, he was given a tour led by a black woman. But in the media, they don't say that he's a black Republican; they say that Trump is the first black President. This makes no sense. Other popular "first black President" claims: Obama has a Muslim background. He's a socialist. He hates the police. He hates America. He wants to destroy America. Obama is Muslim, but Obama does not even know that, according to his father
