Photoshop is not compatible with Internet Explorer 7. Most tutorials assume you are using another browser, such as Firefox, Opera, or Chrome. Backing up your images In addition to the automatic file backup features built into Photoshop, I suggest you save your image frequently in case an accidental delete happens. Refer to the following steps to set up a backup routine: 1. Choose Edit⇒Preferences and set the Save Startup Disk to Automatically. 2. Choose File⇒Automatically Save on Close or press Ctrl+S/⌘-S. 3. To make sure the image is backed up, use the check box on the File⇒Automatically Save As dialog box. 4. Set the number of backups to the number of hours or days you want the file backed up. 5. Click OK. When you save a file, you may want to save the file in Photoshop. I suggest you choose File⇒Save as or use the shortcut Ctrl+I/⌘-I to save to your hard drive. Finding the Editor's Library To find a lot of great items that may be helpful when working in Photoshop, the first step is to use Photoshop's Edit⇒Library option (I explain this option later in this chapter). To use this feature, click the Library button and then click the box to the right of the New Library button to change the current configuration to Library. Or choose Edit⇒Library⇒New Library from the menu bar. Doing a quick start overview of the library contains a lot of very useful items, but you may want to do the quick start overview as a final stop before opening each item. To use the Gallery of Styles, choose Edit⇒Style⇒Style Gallery and then click the Gallery of Styles button. This button is also located on the menu bar under the Library menu. To use the Library Import feature, select Image Type and Photo Elements/Photoshop.1ps from the drop-down menu. The Library Import feature enables you to import images and also import photos from a number of different camera formats, including JPEG, TIFF, PSD, and PSB. You can also save a selection of items to the Gallery by using the Export To Library feature in the same way as you do when you export to a folder. It's usually the first thing I

A new report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change says that it's "extremely likely" that human actions are contributing to an increasing number of recent extreme heat events. And if we are going to keep warming below the Paris agreement's 1.5°C target, these trends are only going to get worse, according to a 2014 report by the U.N.'s World Meteorological Organization. That report is drawing renewed attention from climate advocates, as the organization is set to release its second set of findings on the world's warming climate by the end of March. Those findings, published last December, found that climate change has made weather more extreme in recent years, and that there is likely to be more climate change in the future. "Extreme" is a term with many meanings, and the IPCC report suggests that a new one is needed. In its 2014 report, the body described extreme heat as something that has been getting more frequent and more severe since the 1980s. The climate report called that a "screaming headline," with the heatwaves of the past few years set to continue in the future. How exactly is a warming world making weather more extreme? The IPCC has a lot of factors in play. But they also say that extreme heat is a result of so much greenhouse gas in the atmosphere. "It is very likely that the atmosphere is now experiencing a general climate change," the IPCC report states. "This is the only example of a human-made phenomenon creating an extreme value in weather or climate." The report says that a 2°C increase in world temperatures this century could mean a rise in heatwaves of up to nine months — and three months in just the last decade. Much of the uptick in extreme heat will be located in the "Southern Hemisphere," and the bottom half of the globe will be the most affected. The IPCC uses the term "moderate confidence" when it comes to its estimate on the future of extreme heat. The report says that it could be as low as 23 percent or as high as 33 percent by 2100. That's far from a guarantee — but it's a lot better than a 70 percent chance of an increase. That said, there are other factors contributing to this rise. The intense heat of the 1980s, which brought drought to the Great Plains, are a major driver of this report. But at the same time

By Richard Lambert BBC News, Vienna Play could be used to create freewheeling city parks Vienna is set to become the European city where people can play and party in public. It should be the first European city to legalise ballrooms, discos, street parties and other social events of a very long-for-Europe variety. The new city limits - which will stretch from the iconic Heldenplatz of ancient Vienna to the banks of the Danube - will soon be occupied by urbanites thirsty for a bit of space to play. The plans to open up Vienna's party areas are the first of an ambitious programme of changes to expand the metropolis. And on some parts of the map, the city's nightlife already extends to the 24-hour mark. But if thousands of Viennese really want to party, they have to do it under the gaze of more than 1,500 stewards checking for drunkenness, drug possession, noise pollution and other infringements of a collective peace. In the capital, councils have to keep a lid on the nightlife in most other cities. It's not about the quantity of fun, as much as the quality of fun Karl-Heinz Fleder Vienna's Senator Austria's capital was to be at the forefront of a Europe-wide clampdown on excessive nightlife. In December, Vienna's senate voted to adopt strict rules on the opening hours of bars, clubs and discos. A rezoning of the city's squares, for instance, will have to be submitted to the senate. This is the first step towards total prohibition in Austria, which has no special tradition of partying. Yet party animals are flourishing in Vienna, where students and foreigners can leave the imposed restrictions at home. With a population of 1.7 million, a workforce of 500,000 and a reputation for restlessness as strong as its historic significance, Vienna is currently enjoying a 15% rise in night-time employment. And with its current legal system, the city simply can't accommodate every entertainment venue in the western district at once. It's not about the quantity of fun, as much as the quality of fun. "The fewer official time limits on parties, the better," says Karl-Heinz Fleder, political adviser for the Ethical Society in Vienna. "We now have the opportunity to experiment, the experiment was long overdue. That's why we're really the Mecca for current European experimentation." The imposition of rules may be annoying
