* Photoshop 7: The seventh generation of Photoshop featured a new approach to working with layers and improved color and contrast adjustments. The interface was clean and streamlined and was easily customizable. Professional features such as add-ons and plug-ins could be purchased for this version. Several new image enhancement features were also added to this version, such as new framing tools. Photoshop CS was the first version to be offered under the Creative Suite. * Photoshop 8: Photoshop 8 featured even more streamlined editing options. It offered top-notch adjustments for color, contrast, and more. The tools for handling new types of images such as those scanned from film became standard. Photoshop 8 also shipped with new features such as warp and flip tools, straightening tools, and lighting effects. (Note that current versions of Photoshop include a number of extras in addition to this list.) * Photoshop CS 2: The second version in the series, Photoshop CS 2, launched in 2005 and sold for $399. It was designed to be primarily for the Macintosh platform and included many major new features. The biggest addition, though, was the _Photoshop Elements_ suite, which included improved image-editing software as well as other programs. (You can still purchase Photoshop Elements separately.) * Photoshop CS 3: Launched in 2008, Photoshop CS 3 was first offered as a Windows program. A free version called Photoshop Elements was also included with the purchase. It features a redesigned interface with a focus on organizing the workspace and provides new features such as additional special-effects tools.

Q: Are there any good proven or tested principals for aligning website pages? I am having two same pages in the same website (different url, same path in database, no DB changes). One page is a list, the other a form. My question is do I have to align the two pages when I display them? Are there any principals to align such two pages? A: You shouldn't do any alignment unless you are required to by something. Take a look at HTML and CSS alignment and pre-conceptions. As stated in the linked site, "aligning a form and a sidebar isn't usually necessary." What may be your pre-conceptions is that you always want a form and a list on the same page? That will usually be the case for most sites, but not always. You should make your site meet the needs of your users and be able to make any changes to your site easily. or "Why do you wear a tie to work?" So let's see. We try to make the working situation as tidy as possible. We try to make sense of the system that we are asked to participate in as well as we can. We try not to make any one group or individual look stupid. And that, according to me, is the best we can do. Following that credo, I've been humbled by learning a little about a woman who might be the most sincere, warmhearted and intelligent person I've ever known. I saw Jessica Bruderle, in June, at the Mennonite Women of Iowa luncheon at the Ramada Inn in Des Moines. Bruderle got up and thanked the group for the opportunity to speak. She had just returned from several weeks in Israel, where she and her husband, Mark, serve as missionaries for the Church of God in Christ, with Mennonite Central Committee. Her Mennonite heritage requires a "double envelopment," she explained. On the inside, Mennonites practice an "amid," an awareness of their responsibility to God and to their neighbors. On the outside, they practice the outward manifestation of the Christian faith, the things that are traditionally done in "mainstream" Lutheran, Catholic or Protestant circles. "Within the history of the Mennonite churches, our history is basically a mission work," she explained. One of the things they tried to do in
