rehabilitation centre cares for the birds rescued and treated at Milford Sound, and eight of the facilities are named after conservation organisation's president. The institutions re-opened last year after the Waitaki District Council spent $5.4 million to buy and refurbish a former hospital building - the best available location for penguins. The rebuilding was part of the year-long revitalisation of Milford Sound, including the closure and relocation of tourist operations, including the Milford Track. The rescue centre, Milford Penguin Haven, looks after thousands of penguins every year, treating sick, injured or orphaned birds. The beautiful little blue penguins, known as the world's most endangered seabird, face a bleak future in the human-dominated world, with the small population now considered extremely vulnerable to the effects of climate change. Their numbers have declined 60 per cent in the last 30 years and face a further 20 to 30 per cent drop by 2025, according to the Government's Threatened Species Scientific Committee. It is one of New Zealand's most well-known birds and every year, thousands visit the restored Waitaki District Council property, now a World Heritage site, to see some of the world's rarest penguins. The penguins - all of which have been monitored since they were chicks - are all growing and thriving and now carry more feathers than they need. Photo: Supplied / The Royal Society
