XML is a standard format for describing hierarchical tree structures. This application is not a parser, or an XML editor. It is strictly an XML file viewer. In particular, it does not edit or change XML files and XML documents, which are used for documentation or data exchange. OpenRTF is an open-source library and toolkit for reading and writing Open Rich Text Format (RTF) files. It is a minimal set of classes that can be used in your own application to read RTF files. It also supports some basic editing functions of RTF documents. This project is an open-source project that doesn't depend on Microsoft technologies and cannot be used for writing RTF documents. However, it is useful for reading and manipulating RTF documents. Anyone is free to modify this project in any way they want and use these changes as they want. xhtmlviewer is a web tool for viewing and debugging XHTML files. It supports CSS style sheets and CSS parsing. It can also show colorized source and HTML tables. It uses the XHTML Alliance's module system to allow various XHTML tags to be used. It can also be used to take screenshots of the current web page. This tool can also export to PDF. It is similar to many web-based HTML editors such as WYSIWYG and Adobe Edge. It is based on the DHTML HTML Editor described in the text "How to Find Strings of Values and Variables" by Oren Etzioni (8/97). This tool is currently implemented in Java using the b7e8fdf5c8

A Word about the licensing: For the open source program, you can download the code from the following link. Download XML Dabster For the commercial version, there is only one price: $99. We will always keep the original XML Dabster free. Q: Arguably good answers to "programming" questions I have very limited knowledge of programming and happen to post answers to SO frequently where people ask "can x be done in programming" (without a bounty) and there is a good chance that the code I post will work on any machine as the question is not completely clear. I have never been downvoted for my answers and don't often get comments on them, but it seems that I now have a reputation of 400+ and am an elected mod. I would like to understand, what is the criteria that determines whether an answer is good enough to merit an upvote, or if we have to wait until you become rep-free to vote on my SO answers as you can see, my last few upvotes have been retracted. If I was to upvote an answer that is obviously incorrect, such as a regex that doesn't work as expected, should I flag it? As an example - I voted on this answer, it obviously does not work and it's bad advice, but it was upvoted and didn't cause a problem. A: If I was to upvote an answer
