Why should taxpayers pay for a job that is not in their best interests? SILICON VALLEY, CA — Alex Rosen, M.D., had a problem. He and a group of medical cannabis researchers couldn't get funding to show how the drug could help patients with pain, nausea, and chronic seizures. Their applications were rejected, time and again. In response, Rosen founded the Oakland-based medical cannabis advocacy group the Americans for Safe Access (ASA). He has sued a dozen banks — including Bank of America, JPMorgan Chase, Wells Fargo, and PNC Bank — for not allowing ASA to complete the type of business it wants to do: regular banking with a commercial loan. But according to Rosen, one of the banks — and one of the best — stopped funding his nonprofit in retaliation for his efforts against Wall Street. "We filed a lawsuit against PNC in federal court in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania," Rosen says. "The defense was, 'Well, this company is big, and we don't want to be seen as taking on a big company.'" This is how financiers live. They make business decisions based on the character and power of other corporate players. This small but growing class of financial analysts is called "regulators" by economists, and they are at the center of the American financial system. State laws permit the banks to loan companies like Wells Fargo and Bank of America a profit
