Molecular cloning of lectin receptors from spermatogenic cells and endometrium. Lectin receptors are proteins responsible for recognizing carbohydrates which are often present in the cell membrane and extracellular matrix. In the present study, we cloned and sequenced cDNA encoding lectins from porcine testis and the porcine uterine endometrium. These cDNA fragments had an open reading frame, encoding polypeptide of 181 amino acids. They were 91% identical to rabbit T-cell lectin-like receptor 1, and sequence alignment of these two lectins indicated that they share the same putative ligand-binding site. These results suggest that porcine testis and endometrium possess lectin receptor expressed in common with the lectin from the rabbit T-cell receptor.

1. Technical Field The present invention relates to a liquid-fueled engine in which a liquid fuel is supplied to a combustion chamber through a liquid supply passage. 2. Related Art There has been proposed a liquid-fueled engine in which fuel supply is controlled based on a fuel consumption rate, so that it is possible to efficiently and stably operate an engine (see e.g. Japanese Unexamined Patent Application Publication (JP-A) No. 2000-299795). In JP-A-2000-299795, it is described that when fuel in a liquid state is supplied to a combustion chamber, a temperature of an intake port of the combustion chamber is reduced to a temperature lower than a boiling point of fuel in the liquid state, and thus, the vapor pressure of the fuel in the combustion chamber is reduced to thereby reduce a pressure inside the combustion chamber. In addition, it is described that an oxygen concentration in the combustion chamber is reduced to thereby reduce the fuel consumption rate. Furthermore, it is described that 6d1f23a050
