Yesterday, I found this website on Google (and it said that the owner of that website gets a good deal on Search traffic from Youtube, hence he gets more money from Youtube than he does for other methods of making money. And as a result I got stuck on a dilemma, if you're advertising over on websites like this one and you're getting paid for getting traffic from others, are you actually SELLING or BUYING? A: That's a detail. If the website owner is truly using Google AdSense or another ad network, then he has no control over the way the traffic is sent to the website (i.e. he doesn't decide where it goes or how it is routed). He's only concerned with getting a lot of high converting ads displayed on his site, and not so much on the route through which the ad gets there. So any paid traffic exchange is only an exchange of money for service, the precise details (including what websites are involved and in which combinations) are of little concern to the site owner. Yes, it's basically "selling" the traffic, but not for the price mentioned in the post, just an amount of money related to the conversion rate (as much as 100x the amount for a purchase...). El Frente Amplio podría sumar protagonismos políticos de dimensiones nacionales, a raíz de las recientes renunciaciones de Beatriz Sánchez (FA) y Juan Sartori (PPD). El primero sería la siguiente posibilidad de un vicepresidente, mientras que Sartori podría aspirar, al menos, a una vicepresidencia. Sobre estos hechos, Sergio Bitar escribe en un column para El Observador que Sartori podría renunciar a su cargo de gerente del Consejo Nacional de Elecciones (CNE) porque incluso lo está buscando para su campaña como diputado federal el próximo año. Pero en su caso, podría elegir ser vicepresidente o diputado. En lo que respecta a Sánchez, Bitar se c6a93da74d
